Another 'Dissolution'

So, according to Moscow, the Cominform is dissolved—again. People inclined to classify this as a sign of profound, wholesome reform should pause and exercise their memories.

Slightly less than 13 years ago the Communist International was dissolved. In the ensuing six years before it was “revived” — for international propaganda—by formation of the Communist Information Bureau, the purported absence of the Cominform did not cramp the Communists’ style.

Communist policies remained coordinated and effectively directed during and after World War II up to the day the birth of the CIB was announced. The Soviet Communists directed disturbing activities in the non-Communist world.

Their territorial gains after the war, including the acquisition of vast, populous China, proved that the “dissolution” of the Cominform in 1943 was a strategic move that did not involve any Communist sacrifice or renunciation.

The current “dissolvers” of the Cominform have not renounced Communism. They are merely rearranging the show window. Being dedicated Communists they still hope to rule the entire world.

The head of the United States Central Intelligence Agency recently put the “reform,” which the Soviet Communists are currently trumpeting, into sharp focus. Speaking in Los Angeles, Allen W. Dulles said Khrushchev, Bulganin & Co., are using the late Stalin as a “convenient devil” for personal face-saving purposes and, simultaneously, they are retaining most of the worst features of communism.

Much more than “dissolution” of the Cominform is needed to prove that the Communists have become profoundly un-Communistic.
